Naples

The lively sun-drenched harbour views that tourists purchased from painters, especially Pietro Fabris, captured the attraction of the city. The combination of city and water was of great visual appeal. Fabris consolidated the visual impression of Naples when he exhibited views in London in 1767 and 1772. The largest city in Italy, Naples was one of the largest in Europe, and its population rose, from 220,000 in 1767 to considerably over 400,000 by 1781. In 1800, Naples had the fourth largest population in Europe (after London, Constantinople and Paris) and was the 14th most populous city in the world. As a result it was a densely populated metropolis with much poverty.

Edward Southwell reported in 1720, the evenings were taken up in assemblies, balls, operas, comedies etc., and the mornings in seeing churches and curiosities. In the spring of 1728, William Freneau had found Naples a great seaport exceeding well-peopled, streets clean and large. Thomas Martin reported, Provisions are plentiful and cheap; poultry, game, and fish are abundant, fruits and garden-stuff are to be had all winter in as favourable a climate. Philip Francis and his friend paid 15 carlins (about 5 shillings) a day for lodgings in 1772, less than the daily hire of their carriage (18 carlins) and less than they each paid for dining (20 carlins).

The attraction of the city was enhanced after Don Carlos, son of Philip V of Spain, conquered Naples from the Austrians in 1734. It then became the capital of an independent kingdom, first under him and then, after he became Charles III of Spain in 1759, under his son Ferdinand IV Jr. (1759-1815), although the latter was driven out by the French during the French Revolutionary and Napoleonic Wars. Naples was conquered by Piedmontese forces in 1860, becoming part of the kingdom of Italy.

The presence of a monarch provided tourists with a court that could be visited, although not all were moved by the majesty of kingship. Edward Thomas noted in 1790, No one dined with his Majesty except the Queen and two great dogs. They had their feet several times upon the table and were ready to snatch the meat from it. But how great greedy fools were thrown on the floor to them just at the King's heat, a servant came and wiped their mouths after they had devoured them.

The Neapolitans were not popular with all tourists. William Blackett observing in 1785, Never saw a rougher, more unpolished people both in countenance and manners in my life. They have a vulgarity and ignorance about them which is particularly disgusting.

There were also complaints about the government. Visiting in 1794, John 2nd Lord Barington wrote, Nothing could exceed the infatuation and bad government of the court of Naples... acts of the greatest tyranny and injustice. The Duc d'Arco was exiled, merely from the police having discovered in his apartments some numbers of the French journal the Moniteur, which I had lent him. Naples was already acquiring the reputation for idiosyncrasy and conservatism that was to help garner support for Italian unification around the kingdom of Piedmont in the 1850s and 1860s.
